Shai Oster

China correspondent for The Wall Street Journal

“The Legacy of the 2008 Beijing Olympics”

Many observers had high hopes that the Beijing Summer Games would be a game changing moment, ushering an era of democracy and improved human rights. That didn't happen. Instead, there was a government crackdown on dissidents before and during the Games. But the Olympics have transformed China in many subtle but equally important ways, domestically and internationally.

SHAI OSTER IS A BEIJING-BASED CORRESPONDENT for the Wall Street Journal where he covers energy and the environment. He previously served as Beijing Bureau Chief for AsiaWeek and as Beijing correspondent for the Bureau of National Affairs and the San Francisco Chronicle. He has covered OPEC for Dow Jones Newswires in London. ❖ Shai won a Pulitzer prize for International Reporting in 2007 as part of a team that was cited by the award committee for its “sharply edged reports on the adverse impact of China’s booming capitalism on conditions ranging from inequality to pollution.” ❖ This year, he was the recipient of the George Polk Award for environmental reporting, for a series of stories exposing environmental problems associated with China’s Three Gorges Dam Project. The series also won the Asia Society’s Osborne Elliott Award for Excellence in Journalism on Asia. ❖ In 2005, Shai was awarded the Online Business Journalist of Year for “groundbreaking coverage of Saudi Arabia,” focusing on energy and economic issues. ❖ He also captured the Dow Jones Newswires Award for Journalistic Excellence in 2003–2004 for team coverage of OPEC. ❖ In 2000, Shai won a full-time fellowship from the Phillips Foundation to write about China’s attempt to embrace American prosperity and reject American ideals. ❖ He graduated from Columbia University with a B.A. in history and an M.S. in journalism. He was born in Jerusalem and speaks Hebrew, French, and Chinese.
