This paper links encounters in the Pacific to South Asia through British anxiety over cannibalism. Using examples of art, artifacts, and writing from the 18th and 19th centuries Ms. Ghosh will argue that British anxiety over cannibalism becomes transposed in India onto tigers, and is strategically developed to establish and reinforce British colonial authority on the subcontinent.